KNOW THE WEATHER

By E. H. Sims

What is the technical name for storms in the sun's atmosphere? What is their effect on the earth's weather?

Storms in the sun's atmosphere are called sun spots. Many experts believe the sun's spots, or storms, come in cycles in the sun's atmosphere. The greater number of sun storms, they say, the hotter the weather on the earth.

Cycles in the sun's atmosphere seem to run in cycles anywhere from twenty to forty years. In the past forty years, some experts claim there is an eighty-year cycle (up forty and down forty) the United States has been in a hot weather cycle—many sun storms having been observed.

Those who follow the sun spot theory expect the nation's weather to be cooler in the next few decades.

CONTRACT FARMING WIDELY DISCUSSED TREND

Contract farming is an oft-heard phrase these days.

But, agricultural economists at VPI point out, it is most talked of as a future development. Little is said of how much agricultural production is now contracted or has been contracted in the past.

Contract farming, explains Harold Walker, associate economist, may vitally affect the role of farmers in the future agricultural economy. Shifting of managerial decisions, lower capital needs for efficient production units, reduced risk (in some instances), and guarantee of future income are some of the factors influencing an increasing number of farmers to seek "security" by farming with contracts.

Many people may not realize that contract farming and other forms of "vertical integration" have existed for a long time in the production of commercial fruits and nut trees. In California almost all of the citrus is handled by cooperative organizations on a contract basis. In Florida cooperatives handle nearly half of the fresh citrus and a slightly smaller percentage of processed fruits.

Contract farming is even more significant in vegetable production than in fruit production. About 90% of the vegetables produced for canning and freezing are grown by or under contract processors.

The main integrating influence in fresh market vegetable production are the country shipper and supply dealers. Probably half of the fresh market vegetables and melons are supplied by itegrated operations. The grower-shipper, the most common form of integration, combines the functions of growing, packing, and shipping point selling.

Contract production of tobacco is common only in shade - grown wrappers and in aromatic leaf. Manufacturers themselves produce about 75% of shade-grown tobacco; the rest is produced by farmers who have more or less formal contract with the company.

Contract farming exists in the production of several special crops. Most of these have limited specialized outlets involving an unusual risk of some kind. Examples are castor beans, safflower, mustard seed, tung nuts, and popcorn.

Producer - distributors and farmer cooperatives are the chief forms of vertical integration in dairy farm production. A number of types of business arrangements are found between dairy cooperatives and their members and basereting and similar plans. Many of these arrangements are on the border line of contract farming. They may be the forms from which contract farming will evolve if it comes in dairying.

Contract production has developed more rapidly in the poultry industry than in any other animal agriculture field. About 95% of the commercial broiler production is on some type of integrated basis. Probably half of the turkey production is integrated to some degree, mainly through contracts and other arrangements with feed dealers and cooperatives. Hatching egg arrangements date back to the early 1920's when hatcheries entered into oral agreements or written contracts with egg producers.

Vertical integration in beef cattle occurs chiefly in cattle feeding and takes the form of contract or custom feeding. Contract sales have characterized the selling of feeder cattle for several decades. In recent years contract sales of feeder calves has increased.

Lambs are fed in some commercial feed lots in California, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and other areas. Several of the larger packers own some of these feed lots.

Probably less than 2% of the hogs are raised on a contract. Most packers are exploring possibilities of contract farming.

IN FASHION NOW

Wisps of veiling, fake flowers, and bits of ribbon add up to frivolous fancies that substitute for hats.

Try one width of ribbon tied in a bow and sewed to a comb. A perky effect can be given the bow by stitching pipecleaners to the under side of the bow.

Another idea sample to do but long on effect is to cut a freehand oval from tissue paper for the pattern. Next take one yard of veiling and cut to the pattern. Black velvet is fashioned into a bow and sewed to a comb through the veiling. The comb is used to anchor the veiling and bow to the head.

A large pink cabbage rose in full bloom with a safety pin attached to its stem can be attached to a hair comb and used as a boutonniere evening hat.

Take several bunches of white daisies with wire stems and separate them. Next entwine them in a heavy black hairnet. A charming hat and no sewing at all!

These hats are on sale at all leading department stores and are becoming more and more popular. With a little thought and very little work you can duplicate a hat costing nine or ten dollars for two or three dollars at home.

If you are planning a trip, you will love to have several of these little hats. They require no room to pack and you will be able to carry several without any remarks from the husband.

Continuing need for Israeli economic aid is predicted.

Iraq and Yemen pledge close co-operation.
